

TWO ASPECTS OF JEWISH IDENTITY

A public tumult was created not long ago in Israel when a fallen soldier of the Israel Defence Forces, a recent immigrant from the former Soviet Union, was buried at the edge of the military cemetery. His mother was a Christian, and neither she nor he had ever undergone any formal conversion ceremony. Because he was not Jewish, he was not buried among the Jewish soldiers.

No one who was offended by this decision argued that he was technically Jewish by virtue of patrilineal decent or some non-Orthodox conversion ceremony. In fact, the whole issue was argued viscerally. The young man had come to Israel to throw in his lot with the Jewish people; he fought as a Jew, was killed as a Jew, and deserved to be buried as a Jew.

To be sure, this argument resonated positively even among halakhically committed individuals, especially those who saw service in Tsabal (the Israeli Defence Forces) as part of their Israeli-Jewish identity. This was true despite the fact that allegiance to halakhic norms precludes accepting non-traditional definitions of Jewish identity. The nature of halakhic commitment demands subjugating personal feelings to objective halakhic requirements, but personal interrelationships can make it difficult to simply dismiss as a non-Jew someone who identifies Jewishly and either suffers as a Jew or works loyally on behalf of the Jewish community. We shall argue here that Halakha does not necessarily insist that such an individual has absolutely no Jewish identity, his or her halakhic standing as a non-Jew notwithstanding.

Some three decades ago the "Who is a Jew" debate had a very different face when Brother Daniel, a born Jew who apostatized and entered the Christian clergy, sued the Israeli government for immediate citizenship based on the Law of Return. "Even a sinful Jew remains a Jew," he argued.

Virtually everyone cheered when the Israeli secular courts rejected his petition. Even the most secular Israeli was not prepared to grant Jewish status to a Christian monk. Yet there was an uncomfortable feeling that had the rabbinic courts had jurisdiction, they might have been forced to recognize his claim.

Arguing against this assumption, R. Aharon Lichtenstein wrote a seminal article showing that in theory Halakha allowed for the loss of Jewish identity, technical family lineage notwithstanding.<sup>1</sup> As people move away from traditional Jewish observance and allegiance, he noted, they increasingly lose halakhic standing as a Jew. They may be excluded from certain rituals which are generally limited to Jews, such as being counted for a minyan, and so on. Yet throughout this continuum, they remain Jews able to effect a valid marriage with other Jews. "[Yet the] important thing for us is to recognize the fatal fallacy of the notion that, ad aeternitatem, the crown of Jewry can never fall off, no matter how ill it is worn," wrote R. Lichtenstein.<sup>2</sup> At some point, it is possible to be so far removed from Jewry that one has no functional status at all as a Jew.

An important part of his presentation, the bulk of which we shall not attempt to summarize here, was to draw an analogy between the dual components of the uniqueness of the land of Israel and the corresponding dual attributes of Jewish identity. The land has a distinct holiness (kedushat Erets Yisrael). The first hallowing of the land at the time of Joshua expired when the Jews were exiled; those mitsvot which depend on the sacred status of the land of Israel—tithing, for example—were not in effect during the Babylonian Exile. It was not until Ezra's return that the land regained its sacred status. What, then, was the status of the land in the intermittent period? Was it identical with that of, say, Iceland?

The answer offered by R. Lichtenstein, quoting the late Rav Joseph B. Soloveitchik, is to distinguish between kedushat Erets Yisrael, the "holiness" of the land (which forces us to relate to it on a specific practical level with regard to many halakhot), and shem Erets Yisrael, the "name" of Israel (which simply describes it as an entity). The land might have lost

King David had extended the borders of Israel to Syria by means of a halakhically valid conquest beyond those frontiers promised to Abraham. Yet this acquisition did not endow it with a full kedushat ba-avot, in some ways it remained inferior to the rest of the land. Rambam [Maimonides] explains that David's process was faulty. His conquest should have followed the full conqueror of all the land promised to Abraham. Had the correct sequence been followed, he rules, this additional land would have been identical with that of all of Israel.<sup>10</sup> Radbaz [Rabbi David Abi-Zimra] demurs. Perhaps this additional land might enjoy the same status with respect to some specific halakhic, he writes, but certainly not with regard to full kedushat Batei Mitzvah that of Israel.<sup>11</sup> Radbaz [Rabbi David Abi-Zimra] seems to be arguing that shem Erets Yisrael is the soil in which kedushat ba-avot takes root. Created independently through promise to Abraham.

remains a Jew. It also provokes a provisional shem between keedusha<sup>8</sup>. Inter-relationships between shem and keedusha<sup>9</sup>, the designation that one is tied to the Jewish people, persists even when keedusha is revoked,<sup>10</sup> but a question remains as to whether it has a complete dependency on it, or a quiescent existence. Can shem be created independently or is it only a by-product of the emergence of keedusha?

What is true of the land is true of the people.<sup>3</sup> Using the distinction between sheim and keodusba in reconciling two apparently contradictory Talmudic texts regarding the status of an apostate, R. Lichtenstein concluded that a full and complete apostate may retain the sheim Yisrael he acquired at birth despite the fact that his keodusba Yisrael might have experienced a renounced Jewry, so Jewishness is divorced from him.<sup>4</sup> But despite the fact that such an individual might have no personal standing as a Jew, sheim Yisrael still leaves its impact: "Hence, he is [still] obligated to pursue a Torah life and, should he decide to return, he would perhaps require no new conversion."<sup>5</sup>

Apostates and their descendants may have lost their personal status as Jews,<sup>6</sup> but, somehow, "should they return to the fold they would re-enter reformed Protestant children rather than fresh converts."<sup>7</sup> In a sense, then, the status of full apostates and their descendants falls some way between Jew and non-Jew. On the one hand, they have no need for a religious divorce. For example, should they marry Jews, there is no need for a religious divorce. On the other hand, they have an obligation to reinvest their sheim Yisrael with keodusba Yisrael—and, by extension, Jews have an obligation to help them fulfill their responsibilities.

R. Lichtenstein's rich presentation allows us to understand how our rejection of Brother Daniels's claim of Jewishness is reconcilable with our commitment to the halakhic principle that even a Jew who sins

And parallelizing the situation for individual Jews, there are some lands which for some purposes function as part of the land of Israel and for others do not (Rambam, Hilkhot Terumot 1:4).
R. Jechtstein, "Brother Daniel," p. 268.
R. Joseph Soloveitchik had quoted Rav Hayim of Brisk in the name of the Gaon of Vilna that: a person who is totally assimilated to the point that he does not consider himself to be Jewish has midioratia lost his beitulat Yisrael and is not considered Jewish. As to the question of whether a person who discovers his Jewish ancestry must undergo a formal conversion or might simply "return". Soloveitchik quoted R. Hayim as saying it was added that it seems to be a disagreement based on the Mishna which asked in investigation 110b [personal notes of Dov Frimer [unpublished], November 1, 1972].

King David had extended the borders of Israel to Syria by means of his military conquests beyond those frontiers promised to Abraham. Yet this acquisition did not endow it with a full kedushat ba-arets; in some ways it remained inferior to the rest of the land. Rambam [Maimonides explains that David's process was faulty. His conquest should have followed the full conquest of all the land promised to Abraham. Had this correct sequence been followed, he notes, this additional land would have been identical with that of all of Israel.<sup>10</sup> Radbaz [Rabbi David Abi-Zimra demurs. Perhaps this additional land might enjoy the same status without respect to some specific halakhot, he writes, but certainly not with regard to full kedushat Erets Yisrael, which can be established only on the Land promised to Abraham.<sup>11</sup> remains a Jew. It also provokes a professional exploration regarding other inter-relationships between them and kedusha.<sup>8</sup>

Sheen, the designation that one is tied to the Jewish people, persists even when kedusha is revoked,<sup>9</sup> but a question remains as to whether it has a completely independent existence. Can sheen be created independently or is it only a by-product of the emergence of kedusha? With regard to the land of Israel, it seems clear that sheen Brits Yisrael existed from the time of Abraham, long before Joshua's conquest endowes it with kedusha. The inheritance of Israel is a well-defined quantity after receiving God's assurancce; the Jewish people know towards what the Abraham goes towards it; Isaac will not leave it; Jacob departs from it only to return to it.

<sup>8</sup>Needless to say, while the discussion in this article draws on R. Lichtenstein's presentation, no claim is being made that it is an indisputable conclusion of his position.

<sup>9</sup>Note a somewhat parallel position of R. Menachem Klein. He distinguishes between kedushat Yisrael, which expresses when one leaves a life of Torah and mitzvot, and guy (body) kedushat Yisrael (Mischnah Halakhot 5:24f, p. 34; see also 4:162 and 7:250). Interestingly, he sees of Yisrael, which preserves by virtue of the biological fact that he is mitzra (the seed of Israel), which preserves by virtue of the life of Torah and mitzvot, and guy (body).

<sup>10</sup>Chief Rabbi Ben Zion Uziel (Responsa Uziel, Even Ha-ezer, 19) noted that the Talmudic rule that a mitzvah even though child is a non-jew, it is za'ar or shele Yisrael (Jewish progeny) and it is a mitzvah to convert the child even if the mother will not convert.

R. Lichtenstein's rich presentation allows us to understand how our community of Brotter Daniels's claim of Jewishness is reconcilable with our rejection of the halakhic principle that even a Jew who sins but recants is still responsible.

What is true of the land is true of the people.<sup>3</sup> Using the distinction between sheim and kedusha in reconciling two apparently contradictory Talmudic texts regarding the status of an apostate, R. Leichtenstein concluded that a full and complete apostate may retain the sheim Yisrael that he acquired at birth despite the fact that his kedushat Yisrael have expired as a result of his apostasy. On a fundamental level, "as [the apostate] has renounced Jewry, so Jewishness is divorced from him."<sup>4</sup> But despite the fact that such an individual might have no personal standing as a Jew, sheim Yisrael still leaves its impact: "Hence, he is [still] obliged to pursue a Torah life and, should he decide to return, he would re-enter the details of which need not concern us here, he makes two observations elsewhere in a she'ar of R. Naftali Trop. Recounting a number of positions, the possibility of inheriting shem kedusha is illustrated

The possibility of practical halakhic difference does the answer make? Indeed, what practical halakhic difference does the answer make? After acquiring kedushat Israel, or are both secured simultaneously? And, converts halakhically, does he or she acquire shem kedushat Israel first and only extends to an individual's conversion to Judaism. That is, when a non-Jew converts the possibility of separating shem kedusha from Judaism. But, even though the latter through his election from Judaism, we might ask if the possibility of separating shem kedusha is illustrated

A full apostate who had both shem kedushat Israel and shem Yisrael gave up themselves from the other nations and acquired shem Yisrael. was required to complete the process, but they had long before disengaged themselves from the time of Abraham "had done so to enter God's covenant and separate themselves from the other nations."<sup>13</sup> Immersion crucified from the time of Abraham "had done so to enter God's ritual sacrifice."<sup>12</sup> But, as Tosaphot point out, those who had been converted into the covenant through circumcision, immersion and Shani they gained kedushat Israel. The Baraita states that on leaving Egypt identically as bennat Yisrael while yet in Egypt; but upon their experience at Shani the Jews separated without shem kedushat Israel. The Baraita states that on leaving Egypt the Jews separated before the covenant at Shani was to have shem kedushat Israel without shem kedushat Israel. The Jews certainly had seen the status of the Jewish people before the covenant at Shani was seems that the status of the Jewish people seems to exceed here too. It seems that male twins born in such a situation are considered brothers after the circumcision, contradicitng the general principle that converts lose their relationship to those who were relatives before the conversion. Nevertheless, minorities like circumcision still consider the conversion. Even according to that position, he asserted.

Yet male twins born in such a situation are considered brothers after he is a Jewish male).

the circumcision to complete his conversion (rather than simply because he is a Jewish male).

Nevertheless, circumcision might not have Jewish status, and the circumcision might be necessary to complete his conversion because the newborn child might not have Jewish status, and the circumcision might be necessary to complete his conversion (rather than simply because he is a Jewish male).

The second deals with the status of a child born to a woman who had been endowed with the proper shem.

The analogy between land and people seems to exceed here too. It that the original kedusha could take root only in that which had already which had not originally had shem kedushat Israel. But they are in agreement which is a territory fully kedusha can only take hold on territory not invested with shem.

God's covenant with Abraham, it stands ready to be invested with shem.

But the kedusha cannot fully take hold on territory not invested with shem.

The first establishes that even those who would require conversion of a child born to a Jewish mother and non-Jewish father do not do so because they consider the child lacks kedushat Israel. . . . Conversion is necessary to invest the child with to be a complete non-Jew. Because in truth the child is a Jew, but one who simply a procedural one, an argument that one must go through a fixed, ordered process before kedusha can be created elsewhere. Rather, he is generis . . .<sup>18</sup> An admittedly surprising decision of Dovev Metzbarim<sup>19</sup> illustrates how profound a change in the convert's identity is brought on by the initiation of the conversion process. He notes (quoting R. Hai Gaon) that a non-Jewish male has no yibus with any children he might father with a Jewish woman; that is, he cannot establish a halakhic lineage relationship with these children. Thus, the child of a Jewish mother and a gentile father is Jewish because the child has yibus to the Jewish mother but not to the gentile father. (The child of a gentile mother and a Jewish father is non-Jewish despite the fact that its father has yibus because of a gentile bakaturu, an explicit biblical ruling.<sup>20</sup>)

We have here, then, an interesting theoretical possibility: a person who has inherited a Jewish status of some sort but who nonetheless lacks keodus bat Yisrael.

To grant it keodus bat Yisrael, [and, after such a conversion, the child retains its former relationships.]

Interestingly, here is a clear halakhic construct supporting an keodus bat Yisrael. We have here, then, an interesting theoretical possibility: a person who has inherited a Jewish status of some sort but who nonetheless lacks keodus bat Yisrael. As Rashba [Rabbi Shlomo ben Adret] notes, it is the immersion which allows him "likebanes (to enter into) keodus bat Yisrael."

Yet the Gemara had noted that an extra word in the biblical text is needed to exclude the permissibility of a mal vele travul eating the Pascal sacrifice. Rashba suggested that at first glance such an explicit exclusion was superfluous, as a mal vele travul is already excluded. Yet, he continues, in reality is needed because without this restriction one could have argued for allowing his participation, as

"... inasmuch as [mal vele travul] was circumcised lesben Yabaud (for the purpose of becoming a Jew), even though his conversion is not yet complete, he has already started [the procedure] and has entered the Jewish religion to some extent (nifshas ketzat yebudit), according only to completion [to Genesis 17:4], we could argue that inasmuch as Abraham [had left the other nations on the basis of his circumcision and thereby became Jewish, then—because Passover is basically a national and state holiday—anyone who had shem Yisrael could celebrate the holiday with us]."

Rashba did not indicate what type of Judaism he acquired. Based on Ramban [to Genesis 17:4], we could argue that inasmuch as Abraham had left the other nations on the basis of his circumcision and thereby became Jewish, then—because Passover is basically a national and state holiday—anyone who had shem Yisrael could celebrate the holiday with us. Therefore the text had to tell us that he must be a full Jew, that is [one who has been] circumcised and immersed.<sup>21</sup> appears before the bait din:

If at the present time one desires to become a convert, he is to be addressed as follows: "What reason have you for desiring to become a convert? Do you not know that Israel is the people in whom is preserved, despatched, delivered, harassed and overruled by afflictions?" If he replies, "I know and yet am unworthy," he is acceded immediately and is given instruction in some of the minor commandments [and basic philosophical issues]. If he accepts them he is circumcised [and then later immersed].<sup>27</sup>

The term "mal eeto tawaf" is used to describe such individuals because as a practical matter a male candidate's circumcision follows immediately after his acceptance by the bett din. But this does not affect the ruling in a well-known case of a woman who had accepted Torah and mitsvot but died before being immersed in a mikve. "Despite this, they made shrouds and a casket for her, the bazaar of the synagogue eulogized her, and she was buried among the Jewish graves."<sup>29</sup> Without further comment, Kol Bo al Aveilut extends the same ruling to a parallel situation of a man who died after publicly accepting Judaism but before being circumcised, and even seems to suggest that it is sufficient that it simply be cumcised, rather than mal eeto tawaf. It is not the immersion which makes him into a Jew, but it is the immersion which makes [the convert] into a Jew.

This is not to suggest that the final conversion could be attained without the judicial presence of a competent beth din, but rather raises the possibility of being able to attain such status without a formal appearance before a rabbinic court.

Hyym Elzaz Shapira in a similar character rebuke, argues that "the reason cannot tolerate a man who has been buried in a simple cemetery," but leaves open the question of how close he can be buried to the other Jewish graves in the cemetery. them and bring them to Israel. "Even if they are not Jews according to din [halakhic law]," writes the late R. Moshe Feinstein, "nevertheless, inasmuch as they consider themselves to be Jews and sacrifice themselves because of their Jewishness, one is obliged to save them."<sup>33</sup> We have observed the misuse of imprecision. And the fact that he was made into a Jew obfuscates his real intent, which was to make a commitment to the convert without taking into account the halakhic details of his conversion.

Jews who totally renounce their identification with the Jewish community forfeit their kedushat Israel while retaining their shem Yisrael. And gentiles who identify fully with the Jewish community and its desirability to the exclusion of other religious communities might acquire kedushat Israel before they have completed the full process which grants shem Yisrael to the convert.<sup>34</sup> Such individuals have no personal right to stand by as Jews; they have definite legitimate claims on the Jewish community, although, as we said, establishings the limits of those claims is more. Nonetheless, they have definite legitimate claims on the Jewish community, although, as we said, establishing the limits of those claims is not our practical understanding here.

instists that the Jewish community and its State have an obligation to save Ethiopians Beta Israel might require a full halakhic conversion and yet contradiciton between a halakhic position that maintains that, say, but—to cite a current concern as a telling example—their is no public policy debate.

The specific details of the halakhic extension to them benefits of the Israeli Law of Return would require a Shabbat, whether they are obliged to do so on all whether they are obliged to do so on all halakhic analysis—just as a political decision on whether there is a need to establish this status, formal appearance before a bet din is required to establish this status, but—to bury them when they can or should observe Torah. How to treat the latter when they are seriously ill on Shabbat, are not to be equated with incomplete converts moving towards a life of note of process too, and people moving away from the Jewish community than we would an apostate who has only shem Yisrael. Halakhah takes not our concern here. We certainly extend to them greater consideration of the halakhic extension to them benefits of such incomplete conversions are complete in their conversions.<sup>32</sup>

The convert cannot attain kedushat Israel without a commitment to halakhic marriage. And, in arranging this status, they may have already acquired the obligation to observe Shabbat, and the obligation to bring candidates for conversion what we have termed shem Yisrael even before they would be able to function as a Jew, in, say, contracting a marriage and thus the historical destiny of the Jewish people might well identify with the convert's fate.<sup>33</sup> But a complete law [who granted us kedusha through His master?]) But a convert who is of no avail if he does not himself, he would be a Jew. It follows that he is circumcised himself or imprecise, he would not be a Jew.

<sup>32</sup>The convert cannot attain kedushat Israel without a commitment to observe the mitzvot in immersion because of the fact that he is a Jew.<sup>33</sup> We have observed the misuse of imprecision. And the fact that he was made into a Jew obfuscates his real intent, which was to make a commitment to the convert without taking into account the halakhic details of his conversion.
